Richard Arghiris is a freelance writer, journalist, blogger, and long-term traveler. He has been wandering the highways and unpaved back roads of Central America since 2003, contributing to a range of Footprint titles and a host of websites, magazines and newspapers, including The Independent, The Observer, Perceptive Travel and Intercontinental Cry. His blog, www.unseenamericas.com, features news reports, narrative journalism and street photography from the sketchy US-Mexico border to the teeming rainforests of Panama.

I bought the book because it was updated in 2015 (most recent update compared to those from other publishers). However, there is one glaring error in the book in regards to the Cathedral in San Salvador. Quote-----It commands a striking presence, gleaming white and modern, its facade flanked by two giant murals vividly splashed with the colourful work of the country's most famous artist, Fernando Llorca.-----Unquote These murals were removed in 2011! This made me question the accuracy of the whole book.
